

Her kindred also hated him bitterly <sup>were</sup> jealous of him for two reasons. First, <sup>the reason</sup> it was because the king <sup>had</sup> made him captain of Calais in preference to Lord Rivers, <sup>the queen's brother,</sup> to whom the post had formerly been promised.

A Secondly, <sup>reason</sup> it was because they were jealous of his talents, which they did not possess. When those lords together with many others made their appearance before in the royal presence, the king <sup>raising</sup> lifting himself on <sup>in</sup> bed, supported with ~~the~~ pillows, thus addressed them: "My lords, my kinsmen and friends, you know and I know too, in what state I lie. My anxiety deepens with my growing illness, concerning the condition in which I shall leave you. For my children are likely to find you in that condition I leave you in."
